"It's time for Oregon's leaders to make a commitment to building a healthier Oregon for all of us. This statewide analysis shows we can't do it alone. We need to work together to invest in improved roads and transit, and improved access to safe drinking water, affordable housing and health care. We need to start planning today for our health of the future." The study analyzed trends in 125 indicators of transportation-related conditions, such as bicycle ridership, obesity, air quality, outdoor recreation, and travel-related health outcomes, such as diabetes and asthma. According to the study: In the past 20 years, the number of commuters who drive alone in the Portland metropolitan area more than doubled; Asthma hospitalizations in the Portland metro area increased more than four times; and Unsafe driving crashes are the leading cause of injury-related fatalities in Oregon. In 2016, Oregon's counties reported the highest rates of several dangerous driving behaviors. What's more, the study showed that there was no change in the reported rates of most dangerous driving behaviors. Mapping the data points by county highlights the lack of progress being made to address the nation's chronic air pollution crisis. The analysis shows that nearly 2.5 million Oregonians and almost 500,000 Oregon schoolchildren are exposed to unhealthy air quality levels in their communities. Oregon is not safe for pedestrians. And many of the leading pedestrian safety indicators were not improved in the last decade. The analysis shows a need to expand pedestrian safety laws and to increase the scope of law enforcement for traffic crash prevention. We need to do more to protect our watersheds from pollution. The analysis highlights trends in water quality, threats to water quality, and monitoring of freshwater quality. The report also indicates a lack of progress being made in these areas: Reduced access to school districts and communities who serve the needs of low-income communities, which would disproportionately affect children, adults, and children of color; and Maintaining high levels of pesticide residue. The study highlights that, of the Oregon counties analyzed, only one county met three out of four environmental goals. According 3ef4e8ef8d
