"There are few data points that point to a steady recovery in the second half of this year," said Charles Goodhart, head of research at the Bank for International Settlements. "In the absence of strong evidence to the contrary, we estimate that the output gap closes by the end of 2015 and then steadily narrows thereafter, to about 1 percent by 2020," he said. "We also believe that the effective lower bound of the two-sided Phillips curve is close to zero and that the level of interest rates in the United States remains very low for an extended period of time." The Bank for International Settlements (BIS) is a private, non-profit institution in Basel, Switzerland which oversees the world's central banks. Goodhart, who is a member of the BIS monetary and financial committee, spoke at a panel titled "Financial Stability: A New Norm for the Twenty-First Century" in London. Goodhart was speaking ahead of a later presentation by Stiglitz, a Columbia University professor who is a Nobel laureate. Goodhart said a decade ago the world economy was in the midst of an asset-bubble, which ultimately ended in a global financial crisis. Since then, much has changed, he said. "The world economy has not just come through the crisis, it has actually flourished," he said. "What is missing is that the recovery has not been broad enough." That could be the case for the rest of the year, he added. "Even though we have seen a recovery in the industrial countries, we have not seen it in the emerging markets
