Q: How to make sure the page no longer tries to run js files that it hasn't loaded before? I want to prevent a page from trying to re-run js files on a page that it hasn't been loaded before. I am working on a Lightbox for a site, and am using the Visual lightbox to make sure that the sites' javascript is compatible with the lightbox. The problem is, when the javascript is being loaded, it keeps attempting to redownload the js files, no matter how many times they have been correctly loaded. (This is causing the visual lightbox to completely break!) This is what Visual Lightbox basically looks like: function setOptions() { var photo = document.getElementById('lightbox'); var options = { lightbox: 'photo', photo: 'img' }; for (var option in options) { if (photo.getAttribute(option)!== null) { photo.setAttribute(option, options[option]); } } } window.onload = setOptions; The way I've been trying to fix this is by using the following check: if (window.location.href.indexOf("lightbox.js")!= -1) { //redirect to another page } However, while doing this will prevent the code from firing again, it stills keeps happening. Is there a way to make the javascript no longer try and run the file? I'm using a bare-bones.html file which should have no javascript before the lightbox is called, so it should stop the code from firing. A: getElementById() searches for the element by its ID attribute value. Use querySelector(). Change var photo = document.getElementById('lightbox'); To var photo = document.querySelector('[id="lightbox"]'); Also, if (photo.getAttribute('src')!== null) This will work because you have this node in the DOM tree. window.location.href does not return the src attribute

Six men have been sentenced to death for the beheading of a Christian French couple in the country's far south in 2013. On Tuesday Frenchmen came out to protest at the death sentence handed out by the Nigerien court, prompting clashes with riot police, witnesses said. Police fired tear gas to disperse protesters who threw stones and bottles, witnesses said. The six would-be rapists and murderers were sentenced earlier this month on accusations of committing "an act of terrorism" and "terrorism contrary to religious belief". Two of the men were sentenced to death on 28 May by a court in the town of Tillabery, 415 kilometres (260 miles) from the capital, Niamey, and was due to hand out a verdict on Tuesday. Ousmane Mar Alhacen, the prosecutor, had told the court earlier that the country was under "state of emergency". image copyright AFP image caption The men were accused of "an act of terrorism" and "terrorism contrary to religious belief" Opposition protests The sentencing of the men has prompted opposition protests by Christian groups. They have demanded that the case be re-opened, saying that five of the six did not fully understand their rights in court. France has also protested, with President Emmanuel Macron's office saying the "imputations" against the country were "very strong". The identity of the men, who were initially accused of raping the couple, has not been disclosed. The men are seeking to appeal against their sentences. It is illegal in Niger to publish or broadcast anything that might disturb the faith of citizens. Among those who broke down in tears at the sentencing was the husband of the French couple - whose names have not been released. Police clashed with protesters on a road in the Agadez region as they attempted to enter the grounds of the court. Some 500 people joined the solidarity marches in the capital, Niamey. The sixth man, Mambare Yacouba, has reportedly been granted the status of "companion" with the other five, meaning that he will spend his sentence in the same prison as the others. The two victims are members of the Catholic church in the region, and both parents are still awaiting the outcome of their medical exams to establish how far they suffered. The case came to light in January 2013 when the bodies of the couple and their three children were found
