In a stunning national security breach, a former CIA agent was arrested Monday for leaking classified information to a trusted intermediary about the agency's hacking into the phones and computers of millions of Americans. A federal judge issued the arrest warrant for former CIA agent, Reality Winner, for sending classified information to an unnamed news outlet in the summer of 2016. The secret information was allegedly about a breach of systems at an unnamed defense contractor. Winning was arrested for allegedly passing along the classified information, which she accessed by downloading a spreadsheet from a classified computer network, to a news outlet in June 2016, according to court documents. She was charged with two violations of the Espionage Act. Judge Scott Coan ruled that the government must let Winner out of jail after a jury was unable to reach a verdict in her case last month. He claimed that he was granting the request because Winner was not a flight risk and that the taxpayers would bear the cost of her pretrial release. The Justice Department argued that Winner, 24, was a flight risk because she had lived with a man she knew was a sex offender. When the FBI went to her home in rural southern Georgia, she was not there. Her parents said they had no idea where she was or why she had left. Winner has no known ties to the ultra-nationalist group, "the Oath Keepers." The military veteran was a clerk for an Air Force government contractor and later worked for a scientific company on contract with the Air Force. She was arrested in June 2017 at a local supermarket where she was buying food. The FBI claimed she was found running out of the store with a thumb drive that contained classified information. The government said the 26-page document contained "information relating to the national defense." According to prosecutors, Winner had no clue that the document was classified. She claimed that she was putting it in a safe place so that her niece could read it. The Justice Department said it was investigating another former CIA worker who was arrested last month. Austin Ritter was arrested last month in North Carolina, allegedly for transmitting classified material from May 2017 to another news outlet.
