In ophthalmoscopy, among the many ocular structures, especially the retina, there exist small blood vessels that are larger than normal capillaries of many other vascular systems and are called microcirculation. It has not been sufficiently elucidated so far as to what extent microcirculation exists in the human eye. Using the Black Pigment (Verhoeff's stain), a technique already used in the conventional ophthalmological examinations, we could demonstrate the distribution of the microcirculation in the lens of the eye. Microcirculation was detected in the epithelium of the cornea, in the epithelium of the retina and in the choroid of the eye. The endothelium of the ciliary body can be considered as an extension of the retina. In the choroid, the in- and outflux of blood was shown in capillaries. It is noteworthy that there was no direct attachment between the blood and the pigment.Sunday, February 15, 2008 I have to say, looking back, I would have done nothing to change anything. But, I suppose looking back is the easy way out... I knew then how these things worked and I knew I would change and adapt to what was necessary. What was the real me that would change? What would I be, if I wasn't a girl? Or, what if I were a boy and I was a
