A no-hitter is part of baseball's official statistics, and is scored a little differently from other no-hitters. The pitcher's team does not score any runs while the pitcher is in the game, but the team's runs do not count against the pitcher's team. This differs from all other no-hitters, which are excluded from the official pitching statistics. No-hitters are usually not officially recognized unless it is the first nine innings of a game and no runs are scored. Pitchers who threw no-hitters are recognized in the Baseball Hall of Fame and on the pitchers' plaque. There have been 13 official perfect games in MLB history, 20 no-hitters, 10 of which were earned, and 49 unassisted. Since the late 19th century, many pitchers have thrown perfect games, but only 14 have thrown nine-inning perfect games, and no pitcher has thrown more than 20. No-hitters are generally measured by their length, rather than by the number of innings or batters faced. The length of a no-hitter varies greatly. A perfect game is a game in which no run is scored in the entire course of the game, which lasts nine innings, the minimum for a perfect game. Meanwhile, 09e8f5149f
