The companies announced Friday that they had joined a trade complaint against China filed by the US International Trade Commission. The move was made without consulting with the United States. Weiqia () and ByteDance Inc. () announced Friday they would do business with the United States while Baidu Inc. () and Tencent Holdings said they wouldn't. The firms join a growing number of American businesses in the trade war with China. Many American tech companies have been reluctant to confront the Chinese government, fearing Beijing's technological expertise and surveillance ability to snoop on them. Instead, they have cast a wide net to work with local partners in China and relied on the country's internet marketplaces. Read MoreIf you've never used the cloud as a backup for your enterprise, you might find yourself wondering what it can and can't do. Sometimes, it's easier to start with what it can't do, and then we'll expand from there. Can't it do DNS caching? Yes. Some clouds offer such functionality as part of their services. Amazon Web Services (AWS) offers AWS Route 53, which is a service used to manage domain names, as an example. AWS Route 53 allows you to set up managed DNS (Domain Name System) records, including A records, CNAME records, and MX records. When you need a name, you can ask AWS Route 53 to return that name, even if you don't know what the name is. (It may be a local address, or a network address, or an email address, or something else. AWS Route 53 doesn't care, it just returns the name.) However, if you want to return a specific name, you need to tell AWS Route 53 what name you want. You can give a name to a record that you created, or you can use a record of someone else's. AWS Route 53 also works with
