Mutations in the prokaryotic homologue of the complement-regulatory protein C4BP. A protein that negatively regulates complement activation has been identified from a bacterium, B. subtilis. The presence of this protein, C4BP, in the Gram-positive pathogen Yersinia pestis suggests that it provides a means of evading complement attack, a common response to infection. C4BP and related proteins appear to be present in other bacteria. Analysis of the coding sequence of the c4bp gene from Y. pestis strain CO92 has revealed a highly conserved gene product with a primary structural motif for C4BP. The c4bp gene is normally expressed in Y. pestis, but deletion of the gene does not cause a growth defect in vitro, or affect the pathogenicity of Y. pestis for mice. A SLA-based methodology for the phase development of an object-oriented ontology. This article presents a methodology to develop a formal ontology for medical images within the scope of the European Bioinformatics Institute (EBI). The main intent is to enable effective interdisciplinary knowledge sharing on a conceptual level using controlled terminology and a uniform framework, thereby allowing the integration of data from multiple sources within one ontology. The method and the ontology - driven by the ontology development tool SLADE- are described, and specific challenges arising from the use of medical images in the development and application of the ontology are discussed in detail. The resulting ontology of level 2 is made available via the BioPortal, a database where ontologies are kept as open content. A status update of the ongoing development of the ontology is included. Intraepidermal melanocyte density in aging and melanoma. The distribution of pigmented melanocytes within the epidermis can be evaluated quantitatively by measuring the epidermal pigment cell density, a number estimated from a tapered area of the epidermis. The value of this method in the quantitative study of age-related changes in epidermal pigmentation
