Working with Layers Think about layers as folders. Layers are containers that you place items into. They're great when you want to lay different items on top of each other. For example, you may have a background layer that has a photo on it. Then you can place text over the photo, or add a graphic, or a combination of both. Layers allow you to work with different aspects of an image at the same time. You can easily change the placement or attributes of any element simply by moving it to a different layer, then making the changes you want. The Layers window (Figure 1.1) enables you to control and organize your layers. The center area shows the currently active layer, which enables you to change its attributes (such as color, opacity, and location) at any time. The window is also the place where you create and edit a new layer, as well as where you manage your layers and sublayers. Figure 1.1 Image on an active layer You can also share and group layers so that they're easily accessible. You can have as many layers as you want (as long as they have unique names), with many sublayers that all display in a single layer. Every layer can have a set of attributes. These can include the following: * Color — The colors that you place on the layer, so you can easily change the color of the image by changing the color of just one layer at a time. * Opacity — A value from 0% (fully transparent) to 100% (fully opaque). * Layer type — The layer is either a background layer or a foreground layer. Background layers are the visual aspects of an image that you don't want to mess with. Foreground

European Union steps up data protection in 'battle for control of the internet': report The European Union (EU) has been set a challenge by the Trump administration in its "unprecedented" move to weaken data protection and privacy standards: protect data processing in the EU and the USA. Members of the EU's data protection committee, the Article 29 Working Party, met on Monday (17 February) to discuss how to best respond to issues raised during the Trump administration's consultations with EU states. The new measures have been described as "inconsistent with the spirit" of EU laws and "demeaning" to EU citizens. EU law has strictly defined the circumstances where data should be shared with third party countries, but the White House measures sought to remove the requirement that firms supply "adequate protection" - such as for children or citizen data - and transfer data to a country even if the courts in that country don't have enough safeguards to secure the data. The European Union also plans to press for a stronger agreement on data transfer. The Commission has also outlined a long list of areas it considers to be problematic, including rules on border checks, supervision of foreign banks and general supervisory activity, and the oversight of IT systems and their security. Critics say the move is part of a wider European project to weaken US-EU cooperation - and could mean the end of the 'Safe Harbor' data transfer agreement. This is a fundamental part of the agreement under which US data flows between the EU and the US are properly governed by data protection law. It applies to firms processing EU citizens' personal data in the US. Josep Borrell, the president of the European Commission has insisted that the Safe Harbor measures are "safe for the EU but not for the US", and has launched a programme of "detailed assessments" of possible changes. However, some US lawmakers have been outspoken in their views that the EU should drop Safe Harbor altogether. A 2016 paper from the Congressional Research Service said that the Safe Harbor arrangement violated international norms, and that the new US measures should be strongly resisted. The EU's measures are likely to focus on strengthening the current data transfer agreement - known as Safe Harbour 2.0 - where a series of safe harbour principles have been introduced to try to ensure personal data is adequately

Mamou Biodiversity Reserve Mamou Biodiversity Reserve (MBR) is located in the east of Basse-Terre, the capital of Guadeloupe, an island of Lesser Antilles. The reserve protects some of the highest elevation of the island, the Mabouya, a Caribbean mountain in Guadeloupe, which is part of the Caribbean and Atlantic "Mountain Systems". Its highest peak is, with an elevation of. It covers, mostly consisting of mountains and natural depressions. The reserve is south of the Les Trois Rivières tourist resort. The climate is arid, with a mean temperature of during the summer and a rain frequency of less than per month. Conservation In 2001, a reserve of about was declared as a reserve by the French Ministry of Ecology, Sustainable Development and Energy, in order to protect the Guadeloupe highlands and the flora of the island. It is managed by the of the Departmental Council of Guadeloupe. References Category:Nature reserves in GuadeloupeThis invention relates generally to an improved system and method for processing recyclable materials and, more particularly, to a system and method of processing recyclable materials on the basis of the density of the material and related characteristics of the material so that heavier materials, or materials having lower density, can be processed first. The purpose of such a system and method is to optimize the use of available process equipment and the return on investment in the amount of equipment purchased. The efficient processing of recyclable materials has become a matter of increasing importance as the world's supply of landfill space continues to be depleted. A growing body of research, including a study conducted by the National Recycling Coalition and Waste Management and published on March, 1995, has shown that the increasing use of recycling as a means of disposing of materials has resulted in a dramatic decrease in the availability of material for recycling. Consequently, there is a need to provide methods and apparatus for processing recyclable materials which will result in maximum use of the available equipment and provide maximum return on the investment in that equipment. Since the method and apparatus of the present invention and disclosed herein are particularly directed to the recycling of plastic materials, such as plastic beverage containers, it will be described in greater detail with reference to such materials. Those skilled in the art will recognize, however, that
