The percentage saying the Iraq war was "generally a bad thing" was the highest for any war in any poll Zogby conducted. Forty-three percent of Americans believed the Iraq war was "not a problem at all" while 28% thought it was "not a problem." Americans feel similarly about the importance of

George W. Bush and Barack Obama's foreign policy. In both cases, a slim majority say Obama's actions have been more or less helpful, but three-quarters say "not important" or "not much" of a contribution, reflecting a pronounced lack of enthusiasm for the global war on terror. […] The views of voters who backed Sen. John McCain in last year's presidential race also reflect a lack of enthusiasm for the Iraq war. Just over half of registered voters surveyed said they would prefer that Obama or McCain succeed him, and two-thirds said that if there were no party nominee, they'd vote for another party in the White House. If there are no parties after the 2011 congressional elections, three quarters of voters say the Democrats would be in a better position to govern, with two-thirds saying the same for the Republicans. Only five percent of voters said they would vote for someone who would not support either of the two major parties, while nearly one in four say they would only vote for someone from the Green Party. Voters surveyed who said they voted for Obama in the last presidential election said they would be most likely to vote for a Democrat in this year's
