Estimating the source strength for electron fast imaging in a 32-channel detector system. Fast imaging detectors have become a common tool for the observation of secondary and backscattered electrons generated in a material by primary X-rays. However, the measurements have often been undertaken without knowledge of the emission source strength. When a three-dimensional reconstruction is attempted, it becomes possible to generate a map of the source strength. While this map can be very helpful for visualising the distribution of the emission source, it can also be used to determine when these measurements become unreliable. In this work, we have estimated the source strength for an improved parallel beam fast imaging system. Using this estimate, we demonstrate that the image can be reliably reconstructed with only 5% of the known signal.
