Finally, a word on ColorSync color management. While ColorSync may be unfamiliar to most digital photographers, it is an essential tool that will get better with time. You can find out more about ColorSync in Chapter 9. Chapter 2: GIMP GIMP, also known as GNU Image Manipulation Program, is a cross-platform image editing and graphics creation software tool. It was originally released by a Canadian company, Nori Systems, Inc. (Norisys), although it is now maintained by the free and open source software community. It is free for personal or small business use. GIMP is a cross-platform tool (runs on the Windows operating system, OS X, Linux, and the BSD operating system FreeBSD) that enables the user to perform tasks such as image resizing, cropping, rotating, and sharpening. It is popularly used as a raster image editor, and can export images to a number of supported file formats, including TIFF, PDF, PNG, GIF, JPEG, and EPS. GIMP can be used to create image-editing effects, as well as filters, blends, and layers. It uses a layer-based editing system that enables raster image creation and altering with multiple overlays that support transparency. Adobe tends to view GIMP as a competitor to Photoshop, although the two programs offer complementary features. GIMP is much less expensive, and is constantly improving. It is suitable for beginners as well as professionals. For this book, I will be using GIMP version 2.8.6. Chapter 3: Adobe Photoshop Elements Adobe Photoshop Elements 13 is a version of the highly popular Photoshop software that adds a set of handy editing and image-resizing features to make small-business graphics creation more accessible. In version 13, Elements has its own special tools for editing and transforming raster graphics. Elements now has a streamlined interface that follows in the footsteps of the iPhone. Elements also offers a set of tools for web design, including templates and a set of popular page layout, typography, and photography tools. Adobe Photoshop Elements 13 has four basic versions. The basic version offers a fixed set of features—the same choices as any other version of the software. The standard version of Elements 13 offers more tools than its basic version, including a built-in library of clip art and royalty-free stock

A comparative study of patellar kinematics during gait by use of the Rutgers or Oxford knee systems in cadaveric knees. Nine fresh-frozen cadaveric knees were tested for anterior cruciate ligament and collateral ligament injury using the Rutgers or Oxford knee systems. Six were tested with the patellofemoral joint unhinged and the tibiofemoral joint fixed. The other three knees were tested with the patellofemoral joint locked in 15 degrees of flexion. Results indicated that the patellofemoral joint, when unhinged, does not move significantly in either flexion or extension. Both the Oxford and Rutgers systems were able to detect anterior cruciate ligament rupture with a 95 percent confidence limit and 13 degrees of error (SD = 19 degrees for the Oxford and 10 degrees for the Rutgers), and less than 5 percent (95 percent confidence limit) error in all cases. A single distal patellar fracture was detected by both systems at 15 degrees of flexion. The Oxford system was more likely than the Rutgers system to produce fracture forces at the patellar-trochlea interface. We found the patellofemoral joint to be relatively immobile, thus supporting the stance that patellofemoral joint fractures are relatively rare. We found that both the Rutgers and Oxford knee systems were able to detect anterior cruciate ligament rupture with a 95 percent confidence limit and 13 degrees of error (SD = 19 degrees for the Rutgers and 10 degrees for the Oxford) and were relatively free of systematic errors in most cases.'use strict'; var path = require('path') , util = require('util') , fs = require('fs') , existsSync = fs.existsSync || path.existsSync , join = path.join , resolveFrom = path.resolve , normalize = path.normalize , basedir = resolveFrom('basedir', '../') , files = resolveFrom('files', '../') , resolve = path.resolve; function makeGitIgnore() { return { // '/build' //
