The player motion-capture suits used in FIFA 22 have been manufactured to ensure that the player feels as natural as possible in both movement and on-ball behavior. This level of fidelity is enabled through the use of a biometric approach. Players are fitted with body sensor suits that synchronize foot, arm, and body movements with a custom-made motion capture suit. All of this motion data is then used to create the authentic-feeling on-the-ball player animations seen in the game today. FIFA

20 introduced the first Next Generation Player Intelligence, AI and Player Interaction (NGP2) functionality. Players can now read, diagnose and attack the way they would in a real match, making each and every player and situation unique and compelling to watch. NGP2 provides valuable data to the player intelligence system that coaches use to direct player selections and trainability and ultimately deliver more realistic gameplay. In FIFA 22, players have been equipped with even greater player intelligence, AI and player interaction (PGI). The technology powering NGP2 moves up to the next level with real-time feedback and insights regarding players' behaviors, skills and play patterns.

With the introduction of PGI, FIFA 22 includes a number of other key enhancements, including, among others, a new timed-tackle system, new Breakthrough Moments, and Player Traits. As in FIFA 20, the Defensive Intelligence system will call timed fouls at one of four intensity levels: Low, Moderate, High, and Very High. Timed fouls represent those that are committed in the immediate defense of possession. They also include those that an aggressor is pursuing after losing possession of the ball in a challenge. These are the type of calls that should result in a foul if committed outside of a defensive line of players. As with all foul calls, only the defender's skill level and passing technique is taken into account. A timed foul is assigned based on the aggressor's location, speed and possession of the ball, as well as how the player uses the ball, how much ground the player covers and the contextual environment in which the play takes place. For example, when a player pushes another player off the ball using force, this represents a more high-intensity play and is assigned as
