By now, you've probably heard about the ongoing divorce between Apple and Samsung. We've discussed the juicy details of the past few months on this blog, and have even reviewed the patent war between Apple and Samsung. However, we'd like to talk about the occasional outbursts from Apple, in an effort to educate readers about the company they know, and what they don't know about one of the biggest companies in the world. We'll use the situation with Samsung as an example, but you could even use it for Dell, HP, or any other company. First, we'll discuss the latest rant from Apple, which can be found here. "We've seen a lot of press reports recently that suggest Samsung's latest products contain a radical new user interface. The patent that's being misreported speaks only to the method of input, which has been part of touch screen technology for more than a decade. What Samsung has invented is an original way of interpreting that user input into standard screen actions, like "back" and "home." Those functions may appear different on their Galaxy products, but they accomplish the same thing and there are no secret features or technologies in them." It's one thing to complain about a company or product you don't like, but when a major company flat-out lies, it becomes a different matter. If Apple had actually used the word "technology" in that statement, it would've been a little more believable. However, when you play fast-and-loose with words like that, it's hard not to notice. Samsung is using Apple's own technology What's interesting about the statement above, is that there's nothing new in Samsung's product or in the technology they're using to interpret that user input. The technology the iPhone uses is what you can get from the spec sheet, along with the hardware specifications of the mobile device, and the software specifications for the operating system. While it's impossible to argue with the truth, Apple seems to be going off the deep end when it comes to Samsung's products. If Apple is to be believed, Samsung is creating entire user interface "philosophies" on their own. "Look at the Samsung Galaxy

Q: In typescript/angular2 lazy loading don't change my data in component In my component i have this data: export class AppComponent { isUserLogged: boolean; user: UserModel; constructor() { this.isUserLogged = false; this.user = new UserModel(); } ngOnInit() { this.isUserLogged = false; this.user.init(); } } so i just want to make the user from database when i get the model for the first time. but when i get the data and try to use the methods in my component they are always undefined. i made this call from another component, i check my result in the getUser function: onEditUser(index: number, row: UserModel) { this.router.navigate(['/api', '/api/users', row.id]); } and in the same component: getUser() { this.userService.getUser(this.userId).subscribe(data => { this.user = data; }, (err) => { console.log(err); }); } The way i see is that when i get the data i load the object and put in my component but in the component i don't show the data A: In a functional programming approach, the use of Observables and promises should be avoided because if we have to change the underlying system, the whole component becomes buggy. What happens, we in the next version of the framework, Angular changes the way they push notifications to the components, and suddenly we can't guarantee that the component will work. Observables are a runtime solution in some situations. The component is not aware of them at the time of its design, so you should keep the component pure. If you want the component to interact with data from the service layer, I suggest you look for better solutions that are more straightforward and transparent, like
